The Guildhall. This building—the council hall of the City—stands north of Cheapside, King Street leading to it. Of the old building, dating from 1411 and much injured by the Great Fire of London, only the crypt, the porch and the old walls remain. The enormous wooden statues of Gog and Magog are housed in its hall, which is 152 feet long and has a fine timbered roof. The Guildhall contains a museum of Roman London antiquities, a fine free library and reading room.
